English and German Papers. So important, and even urgent, has the Press question become for the whole world that I will add another word to what I have said before. The word to what I have said before. The efforts of German emissaries in America are directed to sow distrust in the American mind of the English newspapers. Well, it is my business to read English and all other papers critically, as a journalist must read them. In matters of news our business is to have merchalicated. is to have no prejudices, no sympa-thies; what we want is the facts; and after that, freedom to make such use of the facts as we fairly may. So of the English papers and their war news. I must say this: that they are acting in good faith. They do really try to give the public the truth. The truth that they need not be dismight be indiscreet to distribute in indiscreet to distribute in indiscreet to distribute in its doled out from headquarters often in very small doses. But in the papers themselves I see no attempt to distribute in the papers themselves I see no attempt to distribute in the facts or to color them. Any such attempt, if made, would recoil on themselves, since they publish, as you do, both sides. The German vermine.
